Making Train Stations Safe: Platform Doors

The weather is becoming more spring-like every day. Please take care not to get sick due to the fluctuating temperatures of early spring.

Urayasu used to be a fishing town, but the opening of the railway was the basis for its remarkable development.

With the opening of the Tozai Line and Urayasu Station in 1969, the town rapidly urbanized into a highly convenient town just 17 minutes from downtown Tokyo.

I'm sure some of you may remember that when Tokyo Disneyland® first opened in 1983, buses were used to transport people from near Urayasu Station, and that people used to take a bus from the Nakamachi area to travel to and from Urayasu Station for work or school.

Later, the Keiyo Line, which had originally been planned as a freight-only line, was converted to passenger service, and in 1988 the Shin-Urayasu and Maihama Stations opened, greatly improving the convenience of the Nakamachi and Shinmachi areas.

As Urayasu City developed, the number of users of the three stations also increased, and the average number of passengers each day is now around 200,000.

As the number of users increased, the city has been requesting that railway companies improve the safety environment of station platforms. As a result, platform extension and expansion work were completed at Maihama Station—where entry to the platform was restricted during busy hours—in 2022. In addition, to prevent people from falling, Urayasu Station will have platform doors operational in mid-March. The city will continue to request that JR install platform doors at Shin-Urayasu and Maihama Stations as well.

We will continue to work with railway companies to implement measures such as platform doors to make stations used for commuting to and from work and school safer.
